Malcolm Bridger, having left the Army in 1990 after speaking bluntly about his superior officers, has taken employment at a small private school. When the job goes sour, he is recruited by a clandestine government department to infiltrate a lightweight campaigning group considered an embarrassment to the national interests.

When mild political protest escalates dramatically into an act of international terrorism, Bridger becomes suspicious that far more sinister forces are at work than indicated in his recruitment interview. His life is threatened more than once as he struggles to ascertain who, among his supporters and colleagues he can trust and who trusts him.

His military training proves crucial as Bridger is drawn into threats to Britain, the wider European Union and to the people he is surprised to discover he really cares about.

Are some government departments genuinely acting in the best interests of Britain? What is the dark secret that the beautiful young woman known as "Whishful" is hiding? And what is the mysterious oriental connection that pervades the whole menacing situation?
